HD Hyundai Heavy Industries (329180)

Wins power generation engine order

- HD Hyundai Heavy Industries (HD HHI) has secured its second major power generation engine order of the year.
- Given the size of the order, it could support higher marine engine prices, enhance HD HHI's valuation, and fuel expectations of a capacity expansion.

WHAT'S THE STORY?

Winning another power generation engine order: HD HHI signed a USD676m (KRW960b) contract with Corban Energy (a US energy infrastructure firm) to supply HiMSEN engines (9.6 MW class), it announced on Aug 10. These high-output engines will power a data center in the US. This order is the company's largest-ever power generation engine contract, and is 59% larger than the power generation contract it secured in April.

Implications: The deal carries four positive implications. First, the scale of the order itself is substantial. This contract amounts to 25% of the firm's full-year engine-order target. With this announcement, the engine division has beaten its annual order goal. Second, there is the potential for new synergies with the marine engine business. The marine engine market is experiencing supply shortages. The growing adoption of marine engines in power generation applications means the current shortage may persist over the longer term, pushing up marine engine prices.

Third, the deal supports HD HHI's trading at a more elevated valuation. Power equipment companies are now trading at higher valuations than shipbuilders, and expanding the company's exposure to the power market strengthens its case for a trading at a premium (vs its peers). More engine orders should also help alleviate long-term investor concerns towards the shipbuilding cycle (ie, that it might be peaking). Fourth, there exists the potential for upward revisions to long-term earnings forecasts for the firm. Power generation engines are believed to offer better margins than traditional marine engines. Crucially, both this contract and the April deal involve large-scale deliveries scheduled through 2030, leaving room for HD HHI to take additional orders. The company has the scope to either significantly raise prices for engines due for delivery over 2029-2030 or expand capacity to meet demand. In either case, the earnings outlook for the firm has brightened greatly.
